First recorded in the 16th c., but prob. much older in colloquial use. The initial sc shows that the word cannot descend from OE.: if not formed onomatopœically or by phonetic symbolism, it was presumably adopted either from Scandinavian or from LG. or Du. Formally, a possible origin would be MLG., MDu. schudden to shake (:—OS. scuddian), whence Sw. skudda, Da. skudde; but the sense seems not sufficiently near. The ON. skunda, to hasten, agrees in sense but not in form. It has been usual to refer the word to Da. skyde (with long vowel) to shoot (=ON. skiōta), skud shot (=ON, skot), but the Da. change of t into d is a late development, and is not represented in Eng words of Anglo-Danish origin. It may be noted that several dialects have a synonymous scut vb., of which scud may be an altered form. As the earliest instance of scud refers to the movement of a hare, and this has always been a prominent application of the vb., it seems possible that it may be connected with scut sb., the tail of a hare, sometimes applied to the animal itself.]

For the shortening of the vowel (which, as the spelling scome shows, had taken place already in the 14th c.), cf. thumb, plum.

The proximate source is uncertain. The word cannot represent an OE. scim*, which would have given an initial sh. The locality of the early quots. does not favour adoption from Scandinavian, and the word is not found in ON., the mod. Scandinavian form being prob. from LG. The mod. Eng. form cannot well come from the OF., though that may have been the source of the ME. scume, assuming that the u represents the sound ü. Possibly the form adopted from OF. may have been replaced by one imported from MDu. or MLG. as a term of brewing or some other industry.]

Eng. shuttle (of a dam).]

Se, obs. form of So adv., SEE sb. and v., SHE.

Se-, prefix, occurring only in Latin derivatives, represents the L. sē-, identical with the OLatin sē (also sēd prep. and adv., without, apart. With prepositional force the L. sē- occurs in one or two adjs., as sēcūrus secure (from sē cūrā* without care); with advb. force (= apart) it is chiefly found in verbs, of which the following (as also their derivatives) have come into English in adapted forms: sēcēdĕre, sēcernĕre, sēclūdĕre, sēdūcĕre, sēgregare, sēparāre. The form sēd- occurs in sēditio sedition (lit. 'going apart').

The L. sē, sēd is believed to be related to the pronoun sē, oneself. It is disputed whether the d of sēd is an ablative sign or represents a particle -de.

Sea-coal (sī'kōul). [COAL sb.[1]]

†1. In Old English: Jet. Obs.

In early times jet was chiefly found washed ashore by the sea.

c 1050 Voc. in Wr.-Wülcker 416/2 Gagates, sæcol.

2. a. A name for mineral coal ('coal' in the ordinary modern sense) as distinguished from charcoal. Now only Hist.

Commonly explained as meaning 'coal brought by sea'. But carbo maris occurs in the Newminster Cartulary (Northumberland) c 1236 (see quot. in COAL sb.[1] 5 a); and in 1306 a Glamorganshire document (Inquis. Post Mortem, Ioan. de Clare, 35 Edw. I) speaks of 'unus puteus in quo fodiuntur carbones maris'. Unless we suppose that the documents were written by Londoners, or (what is very unlikely) that the London term had been adopted in the coal-producing regions themselves, these early examples appear to point to some different explanation. Possibly in early times the chief source of coal supply may have been the beds exposed by marine denudation on the coasts of Northumberland and South Wales. Cf. quot. a 1552. The name of Seacoal lane, London (Secollane), occurs 1339 in Riley Mem. Lond. 207.

4. Great Seal. The seal (in sense 3) used for the authentication of documents of the highest importance issued in the name of the sovereign or (in a republic) of the highest executive authority; also, the impression of this on wax. Formerly also BROAD SEAL.

When England, Scotland, and Ireland were separate kingdoms, each had its own Great Seal, the custodian of which was normally the Lord High Chancellor; in England the Lord Keeper (of the Great Seal) was formerly sometimes a different person from the Chancellor, but under Q. Elizabeth the offices were united. Since the Union England and Scotland have only one Great Seal, of which the Chancellor has the custody; Ireland on the contrary has its own Great Seal, in the hands of the Irish Lord Chancellor. The Great Seal of the United States is kept by the Secretary of State.

3. In the official designations of certain ministers presiding over executive departments of state.

The occurrence of the title 'Principal) Secretary of State († Estate)' under Queen Elizabeth may be taken as indicating the beginning of the development by which the king's secretary (in sense 2) became a minister invested with governing functions. Throughout the 17th c. there were two officials jointly holding the office of Secretary of State, and in the 18th c. the number varied between two and three; till near the close of this period the two (or two of the three) were distinguished as 'Principal Secretary of State for the Southern Province' and 'Principal Secretary of State for the Northern Province', with reference to the division between them of the control of foreign relations (see quot. 1755); but with regard to internal administration no division of functions was formally recognized. At the end of the 18th c. there were three Secretaries of State, and shortly afterwards the division of functions between them was recognized in their official designation, as 'Secretary of State for Home Affairs', 'for Foreign Affairs', and 'for the Colonies'. In 1854 a Secretary of State for War was added, and 1858 a Secretary of State for India. The Secretaries of State are often more briefly called the Home Secretary, the Foreign Secretary, the Colonial Secretary, the Secretary for War, the Secretary for India. The Chief Secretary for Ireland (officially styled the Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and informally the Irish Secretary), and the Secretary for Scotland (first appointed in 1885) are not secretaries of state, but have similar functions, and are (now) members of the cabinet. The Secretary at War (down to 1855, when the office was united with that of the Secretary of State for War) was the parliamentary representative of the army, and had some degree of control over its finance.

In the U. S., the Secretary of State corresponds approximately to the British Foreign Secretary. Other cabinet ministers, heads of executive departments, are the Secretary of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, of Agriculture. Each state of the Union has also its Secretary of State (or a corresponding officer with some other title).

b. A subdivision of a written or printed work, a statute, or the like. Often represented by the symbol § (preceding a numeral figure); also abbreviated sect. (rarely sec.).

Although in some few books section has been adopted as the designation of a division superior to the 'chapter' (cf. G. abschnitt), the common practice from the 17th c. onward has been to apply the word to the lowest order of numbered divisions. In most recent books the 'section' (or, at least, the division denoted by the symbol §) either consists of a single paragraph, or, if it extends to several paragraphs, has no head-line separated from the text. In modern Acts of Parliament the 'section' (for which the abbreviations sect. and § are both in official use) is a subdivision of the 'chapter' (i. e. Act) containing a specific provision or enactment. In some works (e. g. Bell's Comment. Laws of Scotland), the 'Section' (abbreviated 'Sect.' in the table of contents) is the division next below the 'Chapter', and is itself subdivided into numbered portions marked with the symbol §.

II. 4. A mathematical instrument, invented by Thomas Hood (see quot. 1598) and improved by Edmund Gunter, used for the mechanical solution of various problems.

In its present form it consists of two flat rules stiffly hinged together, inscribed with various kinds of scales. In Hood's form, a graduated arc was an essential part of the instrument, and from some of the inventor's remarks it would appear that the name was given with reference to the form of the apparatus (see sense 1), not, as might be supposed, to its function in performing proportional division of lines.

Sedan (sĭdæn). Also 7 cedan, (? errou.) sedam. [Of obscure etymology.

The conjecture (? first in Johnson, 1773) connecting the word with the name of Sedan, a town of NE. France, has nothing to support it, and seems unlikely. In 1634 the exclusive right of supplying 'covered chairs' was granted to Sir Sanders Duncombe; the word sedan does not occur in the grant, but the index to the patents of the year has 'covered chairs (called sedans)'. The statement of Evelyn, that Duncombe brought the sedan from Naples may be correct, as the thing had long been in use in Italy (cf. It. seggietta in Florio, 1598). It is therefore natural to suppose that the word might be from some South Italian derivative of It. sede (L. sēdēs) seat, sedere to sit; but there seems to be no trustworthy evidence of the existence in It. dialects of any form from which the Eng. word could be derived.]

Sedge (sedʒ), sb.[1] Forms: 1 secg, secg (sech, seic, secgg, segc, segg), 3–5 segge (? gg = dʒ), 5 sege, cegge, (7 sage), 5– sedge; β. 6–7 seggo (? gg = g), 9 dial. seag, 5–7, 9 dial. seg(g. [OE. sęcg masc., once neut. (cf. LG. segge fem., Br. Wbuch.):—OTeut. type sagjo-z*, f. root sag-* (:—Indogermanic sąk-: sĕk- in L. secāre to cut): cf. Saw sb.[2] For the etymological notion cf. quot. 1398 in 1 a below, and the L. gladiolus, which the OE. word renders in glosses; also the rare OE. sęcg fem. (:—sagjā*) a sword.

From the same root is OHG. sahor, sahir, sahar 'scirpus, juncus, carex' (MHG., mod.G. dial. saher sedge, reeds, young shoots of corn). According to some scholars the OCeltic 'seskā sedge (Irish seisg, Welsh hesg, Breton hesq) is for sekskā* from the root sek-*.

The phonology of the β forms is somewhat obscure. In most of the words which have parallel forms with final (dʒ) and (g), the latter may be accounted for by Scandinavian influence, and are confined to dialects in which that influence is powerful. The present word, however, is not known in Scandinavian, and its dialectal range extends to the S. W. Counties. Possibly it may be an euphonic variant originating in compounds where the second element began with a spirant. The form segge, common from the 13th to the 17th c., is of doubtful phonetic interpretation; probably down to the 15th c. it commonly stands for (sedʒ), and in later instances most frequently for (segˌ).]

In early instances it is often impossible to determine what particular plant is intended; the Latin words which are glossed by 'sedge' were prob. seldom used with any very precise notion of their meaning.

ENGLISH DICTIONARY

ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES.

(VOLUME VIII. Q-SH.)

SEE—SENATORY.

BY

HENRY BRADLEY, HON. M.A., PH.D., F.B.A.

NOTE.

THIS single section (72 pages) includes 1285 Main words, 169 Special Combinations explained under these, and 423 Subordinate entries; in all 1877. The obvious combinations recorded and illustrated number 1000, making a total of 2877. Of the Main words 213 (16 %) are marked † as obsolete, and 32 (2½ %) are marked ‖ as alien or not fully naturalized.

Comparison with Dr. Johnson's and some recent Dictionaries gives the following figures:—

	Johnson.	Cassell's 'Encyclopædic'.	'Century' Dict.	Funk's 'Standard'.	Here.
Words recorded, See to Senatory	133	1046	1084	1171	2877
Words illustrated by quotations	98	346	370	85	2463
Number of illustrative quotations	386	435	750	115	9004

* Including the Supplement of 1902.

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 277.

The words of Old English origin, with their compounds and derivatives, occupy about half the space of the section. This is partly owing to the profusion of the compounds of self (all, with one or two exceptions, introduced since about 1550), which fill sixteen pages, although only a small selection has been given from the innumerable obvious combinations found in the collected quotations. There are several native words showing remarkable variety of senses, as see, seek, seethe, sell vbs., seed sb., seely adj. The Scandinavian element of the language is mainly represented by the important verb seem and the cognate adj. seemly. The words of French derivation are numerous, and some of them are of considerable interest on account of their sense-history or of particular applications, as seize vb. and the cognate seisin, sec sb., seigneur and its derivatives, semblance and its cognates. Of the words derived from Latin, directly or through French learned forms, the most important are segment, segregate, select, seminary, senate, and their respective cognates. The Latin prefix semi- has in modern times come to be treated as an English formative, capable of unlimited application; the selection here given from the words formed with this prefix occupies about seven pages. Of Greek etymology are seismic and the related terms referring to earthquakes, selenography and other words referring to the moon, selenium, semantic, semasiology, sematology, semeiography, semeiology. There are a few adoptions from non-European languages: the Hebrew selah, the Arabic semsem, the Indian seer[2] and seersucker (the etymology of this is for the first time correctly given), and the American sercatch.

The articles on the compounds of self and the words with the prefix semi- were prepared by Mr. C. T. Onions, M.A.

EMENDATIONS.

Screaling. Earlier example:—1594 BLUNDEVIL Exercises IV. (1597) 270, Descr. of P. Plancius his Map, This Countrey is inhabited of Dwarfes called in Latine Pigmei, being in height 4 foote as those be of Groynland, which are called Scrælings [printed Serelings, edd. 1622, 1637 Sereelings].

Seeker 1 b. The date and authorship of the first quotation seem to be highly questionable. The passage quoted from Pagitt 1645 appears to contain the earliest known example of the use of the word as the designation of a sect, though the opinion there described was held by the three brothers Legate (c 1600), whose followers were called Legatine-Arians. (See C. Burrage, The Early English Dissenters, 1912, I. 214–6, 259–61, and App. A.

Three distinct Indogermanic roots of the form seq*ᵘ- are commonly recognized; some scholars (as Brugmann) refer the Teut. verb to the root of which an ablaut-variant appears in SAY v.[1]; others (as Kluge) to the root of L. sequi to follow; and others (as Fick) to that of L. secāre to cut; but each of these views involves a hypothetical sense-development which it is not easy to accept with confidence.]

e. With sb. or pron. and inf. as compound obj.

When see is used in the passive the infinitive is normally preceded by to; when in the active, the to is omitted. In early use, however, exceptions are not uncommon.

In mod. English this construction differs from the use of the pres. pple. as complement (see 1 g) in implying a reference to the ability of the subject to give testimony as to the fact or the manner of the action predicated; compare, e. g. 'I have seen him walk' with 'I have seen him walking'. In early examples the inf. is often found where we should now use the complementary pple.

2. absol. and intr. To perceive objects by sight. Formerly often, to have the faculty of sight, not to be blind (now commonly expressed by can see).

Can see often means to have sufficient light or power of vision to see as clearly as is necessary for some contextually implied purpose. Sometimes an inf. of purpose follows, as 'I can see to read, but not to paint'.

II. To have a semblance or appearance.

Normally with indirect object of the person to whom the appearance is presented; where no object is expressed one may ordinarily be supplied. In the present tense, 'seems' is often equivalent to 'seems to me', which expresses belief in the truth of the appearance predicated. Where the object expressed or implied is not in the first person, or where the verb is in the past tense, there is usually, on the other hand, the notion of mere appearance as opposed to fact.

* As personal verb.

3. With sb., adj., or phrase as complement: To appear to be, to be apparently (what is expressed by the complement).

Very often, esp. when the complement is a sb. or a phrase, it is introduced by the infinitive to be: see examples in 4 a.
